ABOUT

In a rapidly changing economic and social environment, the inclusive distribution of natural resources has become critical in the context of sustainable development. Women and other marginalized groups are disproportionately affected by NRM policies and programs, which often do not take into consideration their unique needs and barriers to full participation.

This training is designed for mid-level and senior program managers who require the practical skills to identify and incorporate the needs of marginalized populations in water-based livelihood projects. The training will impart an analytical framework and practical strategies for integrating broad-based gender, religious, and socio-economic equity through decentralized and democratic mechanisms, ultimately ensuring the sustainability of water-based livelihoods for these fragile populations.
